

INT. HOTEL METROPOLE - LOBBY - DAY

Rain streaks the revolving door. INES QUIROGA, forties, crosses the marble floor with a leather document case under one arm.

The night porter, ANSELM, looks up from a ledger.

ANSELM

Room four-oh-two is still under her name.

INES

It has been under her name for nine years. That is rather the problem.

INT. HOTEL METROPOLE - ROOM 402 - DAY

Dust sheets over the furniture. Ines lifts one to reveal a writing desk, a rotary telephone and a stack of unopened letters.

She photographs the letters one by one with a small camera.

EXT. CITY STREETS - RIVERSIDE WALK - NIGHT

Ines walks fast along the water. A black saloon car keeps pace on the road above her.

She steps into the shadow of a bridge pillar and waits. The car passes.

EXT. CITY STREETS - MARKET SQUARE - NIGHT

Stalls shuttered for the night. TOMAS BELL, sixty, waits beside a shuttered flower stand with two coffees going cold.

TOMAS

You photographed them. All of them.

INES

Every envelope. Nobody opened a single one.

INT. HOTEL METROPOLE - LOBBY - NIGHT

Anselm slides a brass key across the ledger without looking up. Ines takes it.

ANSELM

She left instructions. Not for you.